SILVER BLOC READY TO OPPOSE THE NEW GOLD PROGRAMME

Group is Small But Militant in Its Attitude Toward Proposal

GOLD LIKELY TO WIN

President's Measure Passed The House On Saturday

By William K. Hutchinson (I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—(INS)—Drums of revolt throbbed on Capitol Hill today as a small but militant silver bloc launched a drive in the Senate for remonetization of silver while administration leaders sought to force prompt enactment of President Roosevelt's new gold program.

The President's gold bill sailed through the House by a vote of 360 to 40, but struck a rebellious Senate, which probably will be whipped into line though not without a struggle. The opposition came from two courses—from a conservative minority, who fought governmental seizure of privately-owned gold, and from the silver bloc, fighting probably vainly, to make silver a joint basis with gold for American money, and hence for money throughout the world.

The silver bloc, led by Senators William E. Borah (R) of Idaho, Burton K. Wheeler (D) of Montana, and Elmer Thomas (D) of Oklahoma, was ready to "break" with the President. They hoped to create such a furor through the nation as to force the administration into accepting silver on an equal basis with gold as money.

"It is now or never for silver," said one of the leaders. "If we lose, silver is dead as money for 100 years. We carry the battle flags for people in every nation on earth. If we lose, 1,200,000,000 people must go without money. We face our Waterloo on this bill."

The President's measure, which passed the House Saturday, provides: 1. Nationalization of all gold, by giving the Federal Government exclusive right to own it.

2. Funds of $2,000,000,000 to be used in stabilizing international monetary exchange to suit the United States.

3. Devaluation of the present gold dollar to fifty or sixty cents.

The silverites will seek: 1. Nationalization of silver, at the value of the present silver dollar, so the government will call in all silver and use it along with gold as the basis of money. It would mean remonetization of silver on a ratio of 32 to 1 or 28 to 1, depending on the point where the President stabilizes the gold dollar.

2. Government purchase annually of a fixed quantity of silver to be used as money on the same basis.

Reports emanating from New York declared the President was opposed to any increased use of silver as money in this country. The silverites blamed the statements on the "gold masters" and charged the President had been influenced into abandoning silver by threats of the money masters to embarrass the government in future financing in event silver should be remonetized.

Memorable Events Recalled By "Bowery" Old-Timers

Do you remember when the Bowery was to New York what Broadway is today?

When there was talk of impeaching Rutherford B. Hayes to prevent his serving as President of the United States?

When Steve Brodie announced he had jumped from the Brooklyn Bridge?

Those are some of the memories of many of the Hollywood film players and extras appearing with Wallace Beery, George Raft and Jackie Cooper in "The Bowery," 20th Century's screen production of early New York showing tonight and tomorrow at the Grand Theatre.

Old-time fight champions, stage celebrities, bartenders, politicians and other frequenters of the old Bowery in the preceding century were among the crowd that peopled the studio sets while the picture was in production under the direction of Raoul Walsh.

Among the historic memories revived by their early-day reminiscences were these: John Jacob Astor's appointment of his son, Waldorf, as manager of his 3,000 houses... The Jefferson Market Prison opening with a 13-year-old boy as its first prisoner... James J. Corbett astounding the sports world by knocking out John L. Sullivan... Sign over a clothing store: "Men's Suits $3 and $5—Imported $10"... The great circus man, P. T. Barnum, announced his free lecture on temperance at Cooper Union Hall.

Wallace Beery, as the star's understudy, stepping from the chorus to Raymond Hitchcock's role when the star took sick during the Broadway run of "The Yankee Tourist"... Raoul Walsh making his first bid for fame as a lightweight fighter.

CHINA PLANS BIGGER NAVY FOR EMERGENCY

Preparing for War in The Pacific, Which is Topic Much in Mind

FUNDS ARE LACKING

(This is the third of a series of four articles on the trend of events in China, all of which exert powerful bearing on the burning issue of whether 1934 will see a major outbreak of hostilities in the Pacific Basin.—International News Service.)

By John Goette (I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

PEIPING, Jan. 20—(INS)—The mass of the Chinese population became more familiar with airplanes during 1933 than ever before. Hundreds of Chinese soldiers and civilians were killed by bombs dropped from Japanese military planes, while hundreds of thousands watched fearfully skyward as Japanese bombers maneuvered over Peiping, Tientsin and North China.

The government's desire to establish a modern air force was forcefully driven home in the minds of millions through the two National Aviation Lotteries held in 1933, where in the first prize of half a million dollars was bait to induce a popular subscription to the cause of Chinese aviation. American pilots flew over the countryside dropping leaflets advertising the lottery.

Two excellent aviation schools got into proper working order in 1933. One is at Canton and the other at Hangchow, where a dozen or more expert American pilots under Colonel Jouett, are training Chinese in combat flying.

Scores of American planes were sold in China in 1933, while the commercial routes operated by a subsidiary of a great American air corporation have been much enlarged. Pioneering by the Americans and Germans exceeded anything done in previous years in China.

Plans have been submitted to the National Government for the construction of a two million dollar airport at Shanghai designed to be the central terminus of the 1,200,000 miles of commercial air lines which are expected to be operating in the near future.

National leaders have publicly declared that China's salvation lies in the air. Every effort has been made in 1933 to arouse the masses to an aviation consciousness. It is perhaps this striking of a militant note in aviation which causes the Japanese to be concerned. This concern has been openly expressed in a statement issued by the Japanese Military Attaché's Office here wherein the United States is accused of assisting China with the base motive of obtaining a monopoly of aviation business.

Japanese fears are not ungrounded in this direction. The visit of America's Ace, Major Jimmy Doolittle who enthralled thousands of Chinese in Shanghai with feats never before seen in the air of Asia, was productive for American aviation business beyond measure. When the Major demonstrated to Chinese officials what could be done with American combat and pursuit planes, they were sold on the idea and large orders were immediately placed. By a curious coincidence, the largest Japanese air armada ever flown over China appeared over Peiping the very day of his arrival.

While Colonel Jouett and his American pilots are teaching Chinese cadets, it remained for American civilians to push China's commercial lines to new points. 1923 saw the inauguration of a regular passenger and mail service clear from Peiping to Canton by way of Shanghai and intermediate southern points. Likewise the first flight was accomplished between Shanghai and Manila and a regular service should result between these cities in 1934.

Thus far Japan's lot in Chinese aviation has been that of encouragement through the large toll of death and property destruction which her bombing planes have done first in Manchuria, then in Shanghai and in 1933 in North China.

Likewise Soviet Russia has played a minor part. Aside from a few independent Russian pilots, there has been no influence from that direction other than the destruction wrought on

STEAL 2600 GALLONS 'GAS' FROM STORAGE TANK HERE

State Police Investigate Theft From Tanks at South Bristol

MUST HAVE USED TANK

It has been reported to the State Police at Morrisville that 2600 gallons of gasoline were stolen from the tanks of the Sinclair Company, South Bristol, Friday night.

State Police are investigating the theft.

It was found that a lock had been sawed off one of the pipe lines of one tank. It is believed that in this manner the gasoline was drained from the large storage tank.

It is also believed that the thieves must have had a tank wagon in order to get away with so much of the gasoline in so short a time, as would be afforded during one night.

It might have been that the gasoline was carted away on two or more different occasions and the lock replaced and not noticed having been broken.

It is stated that it requires almost 12 hours to run 1500 gallons into one of the largest tank wagons which the Sinclair people have. If such is the case the thieves must have made more than one visit.

The gasoline is valued at approximately 13 cents per gallon.

CONFIDENT BREMER WILL BE RETURNED

Father and Wife Feel Sure Banker Will Be Unharmed

MISSING FOR FIVE DAYS

By Thomas F. Cullen (Former Dept. of Justice Agent) (Copyright 1934 by I. N. S.)

ST. PAUL, Minn., Jan. 22—Edward G. Bremer, St. Paul banker, who was kidnapped five days ago, may be returned unharmed, according to all indications today. The group of "big time" operators of the kidnapping racket who abducted the wealthy Bremer, the ransom, equal to the largest ever paid in this country, however, will have to be paid to gain his release. There will be no long, drawn-out negotiations with the mob who grabbed him. The terms have been laid down, tersely and determinedly, and today it appeared, from all facts available here, that the gang meant exactly what it said when $200,000 was demanded.

By Thomas F. Cullen (I. N. S. Staff Correspondent)

ST. PAUL, Minn., Jan. 22—(INS)—Confidence that Edward G. Bremer, kidnapped banker, would be returned unharmed was felt today by his father, Adolph Bremer, and his wife today although the family has had no communication or contact with him or his abductors since his disappearance five days ago.

It became definitely known this morning that Adolph Bremer, Democratic leader and wealthy brewer, has received no word from the captors of the young banker since the message Walter W. Magee received shortly after the kidnapping last Wednesday morning.

Since last Friday Adolph Bremer has had $200,000 in used bills ready to pay the ransom then demanded.

Soon after it was known that this sum would be the price of Edward's release the brewmaster raised the money and obtained currency in small bills from the Federal Reserve Bank with which to meet the abductor's terms.

The father of the kidnap victim is bearing the strain of his son's misfortune extremely well, close friends report, and appears convinced that Edward will be returned safely to his family.

He declined to talk for publication and maintained the silent vigil which has been his lot since last Wednesday.

Mrs. Edward G. Bremer, wife of the missing president of the Commercial State Bank, remains in seclusion in a beautiful home overlooking the Mississippi river with her daughter Betty, who was the last member of the family to see her father.

Mrs. Bremer refuses to see all callers but likewise is standing up under the arduous ordeal with considerable fortitude and with confidence that her husband will be returned unharmed.

Although those close to the Bremers declined to be quoted they agree that no word has been received and that today they are unable to anticipate the date of Edward's release.

Meanwhile the police and Federal agents are impatiently standing by awaiting the word to go into action.

Giving the older Bremer every chance to obtain the release of his boy without interference from authorities, they are chafing under the enforced inactivity.

At the same time they admit they do not want to do anything which will jeopardize the life of the victim.

Numerous false leads and tips have been sent to police and these have given the officers a chance to do something even though up to now all the clues have been baseless.

All these have been discounted by the police and there remain no real leads.

THE PHILIPPINE ISSUE

The Philippine question again is before congress as result of the islands' rejection of the unjust independent plan submitted to them in the Hawes-Cutting act.

That the real issues relating to independence were subordinated in the latter to the interests of American sugar producers was evident. Had the Hawes-Cutting act been approved, the islands, when they finally obtained their independence after 15 years, would have been on the rocks economically.

The United States owes a higher duty to the Philippines than to misuse them in this way. The question of independence is one which should be determined solely on its merits as affecting the welfare of the islands. To permit the selfishness of private interests to attach conditions and requirements that would prove damaging or disadvantageous to the islands and their people would be a serious breach of trust on the part of the United States.

The Hawes-Cutting act will have served a useful purpose if it has impressed this fact on congress. It is not to be expected, however, that reopening of the independence question will find those interests which played a prominent part in the framing of the discredited law inactive. There may be a change in their methods, but their efforts, it can be felt with assurance, will be directed with the same ends as formerly in view.

The matter is one that needs to be disposed of definitely and in a way that will be fair to the Philippines.

SOLVED HIS OWN PROBLEMS

Striking is the case of Edward Dwyer, of Weymouth, Mass. Mr. Dwyer is a dairy farmer. At 31 he stands out as a conspicuous example of what initiative and intelligence and close application to work can do in the achievement of success.

His case came to public attention the other day when the Massachusetts state department of agriculture honored him for his "credit accomplishments in dairying."

In a day when all branches of farming are crying for aid and the government is supplying this in increasing quantities, and when unrest in some agricultural sections is taking the form of mob violence, the case of the Massachusetts dairyman is deserving of more than ordinary attention. Mr. Dwyer began farming in 1915. He made his start with one sow, and today owns 75 head of cattle, 1,000 swine, seven horses and 800 hens. His success was not easily won. For several years he worked seven days a week from 4 a. m. to 8 p. m. His sow had a family, which Dwyer sold and, with the proceeds, bought a cow. With the cow's milk he started a small delivery route among his neighbors. Then from his father he borrowed a little money and enlarged his herd, meanwhile graduating from the Norfolk county agricultural school.

He probably still has his problems, but in reaching his present stage of success he demonstrated an ability for dealing with such things that must give him a very satisfying feeling of confidence in the future.

Echoes of The Past

Quotations

The newspapers, conversation, and the radio during the last few years, are bearing on the word "taxes" more freely than any recalls in a long number of years, and one hears, every now and then, "Nothing is certain but death and taxes." Who coined this saying? None other than Benjamin Franklin when he wrote that the constitution of the United States was in operation and to all appearances would last. And the years confirm his belief. And now one learns that the County Commissioners of Bucks have advised the assessors that a ten per cent cut on valuations of properties is possible. One wonders if Benjamin Franklin would be peruse the daily papers, and the many different periodicals—bearing in so many instances on taxes—just what that wise head of his would be thinking. One can almost hear him saying, "My, oh, my! the taxes are soaring higher than ever my kite did. But then, I held it under control and brought it safely to earth after successfully demonstrating my theory, so why not give the benefit of the doubt—for there is ever a doubting Thomas—that the high soaring taxes will soon drop."

Politics, or in other words, those who handle the heavy responsibilities of the nation, are often like Humpty-Dumpty sitting on the wall that divides the opinions of the wise men of the nation, but if he sits steady he need not necessarily fall. At "Gingerbread Castle," visited annually by thousands of people, the Humpty-Dumpty sitting enconced on that solid bit of masonry, looks as though he defied any suggestion of a fall, and may be long sit in security, with a smile of assurance on his full-moon face. It isn't always best to predict the failure of planned devices for the salvation of the nations, for too many live in glass houses. Another quotation, and from whence did it arise? James I, of England, when his favorite, the Duke of Buckingham, complained that a mob had broken his glass windows—then considered a mark of great extravagance—replied, "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

Wits and Wags

One explaining the old phrase, "Mind your p's and q's," gave as an authority the meaning to be taken from an old posting on the doors of the tap rooms in England those who failed to pay for the beverages they consumed at the bar, meaning, "Mind that you owe for your pints and your quarts. Pay up if you wish your name to be dropped from the list." This method is said to have been, in a great measure, successful as one disliked having his name posted in public as a delinquent purchaser on unpaid goods. But here arises another explanation of that old saying. It is said to have been taken from an old French phrase at the time of Louis XIV. The dancing master, wishing his pupils to be proficient in making the very low bow, which was then one of society's demands, would warn them to look well to the position of their feet and the movement of the head lest their cues wigs be disarranged. And what more ludicrous object could be found in a famous dancing parlor than one with a cue trying desperately to cover one eye? The French word for foot is pied, so the saying, "Mind your p's and q's," when taken up by the English, was converted into "Mind your p's and q's." Good advice whatever way it is interpreted. In the words of today, "Watch your step." Speaking of conforming to society's demand for the low bow and the backward movement when leaving the presence of royalty, one recalls hearing of the mortification of an American on being presented to their Majesties. It was the time of hoop-skirts and high heels. She caught her heel in one of those unrelenting wires that held her, as it were, for ransom. She bowed with a struggling consciousness that her awkward stumbling as she struggled to get that heel loose, would bring royal displeasure, but it was the king himself who was the first to understand her mortifying situation and whispered to a near-by attendant, to go to the lady's assistance by lifting that heel out of its wire trap. None dared smile. The king had saved the day. You know those three feathers one is expected to don as a sort of headgear, well, they, in their bobbing, lost part of their plumage.

Hope

Mythology always places Hope in Pandora's box. So with Cleero. The world seemed tumbling about his ears. Someone approached him. "What is our next move, sir?" he questioned. Then without a reply, he shook his head despairingly and answered his own question with, "Why ask? There is no next move?" This spurred Cleero to instant action and he replied with awakened vim. "While there's life there's hope. We're not beaten." And so, all down through the years one is saying and hearing it said by others, those words uttered by Cleero, "While there's life there's hope." Hope leaps to action.

If—

If we've heard this saying once we have heard it more times than one cares to count. "Never put off till tomorrow what you can do today," and this old saying originated when Lord Chesterfield explained, when asked how it was possible to accomplish so much work, "I never put off till tomorrow what I can do today." Little did he dream those few words would ring down through the ages. If it served him faithfully, that method of accomplishing it, has served others equally well. In looking over those famous letters of his, written to his son, one finds another saying that has weathered the years, "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well."

Mispronounced

Lord Eldon, Lord Chancellor of England, during the first twenty-six years of the 19th century, continually mispronounced the name of Henry Brougham, who later succeeded him to that office. He resented the way in which Lord Eldon pronounced his name, saying it was pronounced at "Broom." Shortly after, he made an excellent speech and Lord Eldon, in writing of it, then and there coined the expression, now in general use, "New Brooms sweep clean." At the same time, not only pronouncing the name correctly, but providing a proverb for coming generations.

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

Lights wheeled in the streets around them as other cars shot past. People hurried along the sidewalks. An elevated train rattled overhead. Clark drove on and on. At last Patricia touched his arm.

"We can't drive forever."

"We won't, my dear. I'm going to take you home with me."

Home with Clark! At those exquisite words the horror ended. Home with Clark! There would be refuge there. She was so tired of struggling, of loneliness, of desperation. And he had asked to share her burden. A hot, wet tear rolled down Patricia's cheek and fell upon Clark's hand.

It was minutes before the man at the wheel spoke. Then he said: "What happened? Where have you been—?"

Patricia roused. She had been leaning against his shoulder, spent, exhausted. Now she straightened. Someone must trap Bill McGee before, slipping through the dark waters of the Sound, he escaped.

"I must go to the police," she said once more.

"Nonsense," he said. "That's nonsense. I know you didn't kill Julian Haverholt. What we've got to find out is—who did?"

The police, the newspapers, the whole world believed her guilty of murder, but Clark knew that she was innocent; his faith had never wavered. One of his hands was on the wheel, the other now held her hand tightly as if he would never let it go. And Patricia told her story and was silent.

The man's face was set and white. Without warning he abruptly swung his car about. The headlights described a glowing arc, glittered on the bare, black branches of the trees that overhung the boulevard, shone upon the street again.

"Where are you going, Clark?"

He spoke simply and with finality.

"I'm going after Bill McGee," he said.

The night was bitter cold. The air had a bone piercing chill. Patricia shivered as the last turn came and they swung into a mean street redolent with the smell of the wharves. They had arrived at the gloomy cul-de-sac from which she had fled an hour before. All her argument, all her pleading had been in vain. Clark had been determined that he would settle his quarrel with Bill McGee, that he and he only would bring the murderer to justice. This was a new Clark, a strangely grim, unswerving man. He brought the car to a silent halt and sprang to the curb.

"You stay here," he said, and then plunged into the darkness which concealed the pier where the rum-boats lay at anchor.

Patricia waited until he disappeared. Then she, too, was on the street, following swiftly in his wake. The wharf was quite deserted, wrapped in night, but there was the sound of his rapid footsteps to guide her on. Suddenly as she turned a corner she came upon the widening river. Boatlights gleamed in distance, and in the bitter wind, black water swirled and washed against the dock's supports. No boat rode at anchor.

The Lazy Mary was gone. Clark turned and saw her there. "McGee has skipped," he said. "I'm glad, Clark."

"Don't be glad yet—the man was quiet a moment—The harbor police are next. There's no way out of it. Are you willing to take the chance of recognition? I don't think it's very likely."

"I want to take the chance. You'll need me. I know the boat."

The blue-coated telephone operator got Headquarters on the wire. Commissioner Young was home in bed. It was about the Haverholt case? Just a minute. Would Inspector Ferguson do? No? Just a minute. Eventually Clark heard the Commissioner's voice.

Even as the night visitor talked, the Lieutenant knew what his orders would be. When Clark had finished, half a dozen men in slickers were ready and the police launch

Clark was already telling his story. Bill McGee had murdered Julian Haverholt, the bridge expert.

Winding along the water front, dodging in and out of sleeping streets, their car brought Clark and Patricia five minutes later to the green lights of a police station. The river was less lonely here. A dozen freight docks within a stone's throw were manned by night watchmen walking up and down. Dodging through the wind, Clark and Patricia ducked into the station.

A sleepy-eyed lieutenant raised his eyes as the door of the station was opened and then slammed shut. Several patrolmen, paused from a half-hearted game of pinocle, slouched in from the squad-room in the rear. Patricia hesitated in half panic; then from their casual, uncurious glances, knew that she was safe.

Clark was already telling his story. Bill McGee—yes, they knew Bill McGee by reputation—had murdered Julian Haverholt, the bridge expert. It could be proved. And Bill McGee was now cruising up the East River, possibly pointed out toward the Sound, possibly lolling in the lee of one of the city islands.

The lieutenant tapped his pencil on his teeth. There had been no alarm sent out for McGee, he ventured. So far as he knew, McGee wasn't wanted. And finding a boat on the river on a night like this was no picnic. He regarded the two at the desk skeptically—a pale and unkempt girl, a young man laboring under patently concealed excitement.

"I'm not questioning your story," he said doubtfully. "It may be true. But I think that you better take the matter up with Headquarters in the morning."

"Tomorrow will be too late."

"I wouldn't want to act without orders from Headquarters."

"Get them on the telephone," said Clark. "Get the Commissioner. I'll talk to him."

The blue-coated telephone operator got Headquarters on the wire. Commissioner Young was home in bed. It was about the Haverholt case? Just a minute. Would Inspector Ferguson do? No? Just a minute. Eventually Clark heard the Commissioner's voice.

Even as the night visitor talked, the Lieutenant knew what his orders would be. When Clark had finished, half a dozen men in slickers were ready and the police launch was humming at the pier. The Commissioner, disbelieving at first, had been convinced. The word of a member of the millionaire Tracy family carried weight. And, strangely, he had been finally won when Clark blurted out the news that he had with him the hunted Patricia Warren.

"I'll parole her in your custody," the Commissioner had said. "I'll hold you responsible for her and if this turns out to be a wild goose chase it is part of the bargain that you must bring her to Headquarters yourself."

"A bargain," said Clark. The police launch was a slim, rakish craft. Patricia, concealed now in a slicker three sizes too large, trembled with chill and excitement as they swept away from the dock, turned sharply in the rising waves, and swung up the river with steadily increasing speed. Clark was beside her.

"We'll never find McGee," said the Sergeant in command, as he approached the two who stood beside the rail, "but we'll start out from the wharf where he was anchored and sweep up the river as best we can."

Patricia spoke with the assurance of prophecy.

"We'll find him," she said. Already the searchlights were swinging in bright and monstrous circles. Their bow cut like a knife through the blackness of the water. Spray leaped over the side in great gusts, the keen wind whipped and tore. It was cold and wet and—dangerous. Now and again a viciously approaching breaker swept the craft at an angle and they rolled and pitched but never modified their speed. The lights hunted over the shore and low-lying wharves, and cast a bright eye over the vessels which lay at anchor.

"McGee will be running without lights," said the Sergeant. Ten minutes passed, fifteen minutes, a half hour. Patricia had begun to despair. She stayed close to Clark, but he seemed almost unaware of her presence, his eyes following each fresh exploration of the cold, white lights. A rain was coming on and the preliminary drops scattered diamond-like through the moving glare. The river widened. The Sound was just ahead.

Federal Government Joins In Search for Liquor Candy

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 22—(INS)—Following the disclosure that the practice has spread along the entire eastern seaboard, the Federal Government today joined the battle against the sale to school children of candy containing intoxicating liquors.

Warrants for the arrests of five known Philadelphia offenders were to be sworn out today by John H. Tryon, general agent of the State Bureau of Foods and Chemistry for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

"Sale of such confections," said Dr. Joseph W. E. Harrison, consulting chemist for the state bureau who analyzed some of the candy seized here, "is an offense whose enormity is on a par with the sale of narcotic drugs to children."

STOP "BUTCH" DE BOSKEY CRY AT GAME TONIGHT

"Stop 'Butch' DeBoskey!"

That will be the cry of the Knights of Columbus followers tonight in the Italian Mutual Aid Hall as the Third Ward A. C. clashes with the Radcliffe street organization team. In the second match, the Odd Fellows will meet the Y. M. A. club.

DeBoskey has been the scoring power of the downtown team and recently led the club to a victory over the Y. M. A. team. In this game, the Warders pivot star counted 27 points. It is very seldom that DeBoskey is held to a low score.

Guarding the Third Ward forward will be Marty Fallon. The last time the teams met, Fallon did a fine job in holding down the Trenton boys, and if successful in doing this tonight will probably bring victory to the Casey's.

The Casey's are undefeated the second half and have scored victories over the Odd Fellows and Hibernians. Manager Craven will use his new line-up in the fray, meaning that the newly acquired "Jimmy" Lake will be sharing a forward post with Lou Parker, with Morrissey center and Fallon and Corrigan guards. Lake was a former player of the Third Ward team and is anxious to show up his former team-mates.

The Odd Fellows are out to make things pretty interesting for the Y. M. A. followers. The "Oddies" have dropped two contests and are out to make things look different for these clubs which look like contenders.

Opening tap-off will take place at eight o'clock, sharp.

Expect Answer Today In Vallee-Webb Suit

NEW YORK, Jan. 22—(INS)—Legal machinery that will definitely and finally sever the Vallees—Rudy the crooner and Fay Webb, his estranged wife—will start grinding, the singer promised today, as soon as Supreme Court Justice John E. McGeehan hands down the answer sometime this afternoon to the question:

"Where do we live?"

Justice McGeehan today was scheduled to rule on Vallee's petition for an injunction restraining Fay from bringing a $7400-a-month separate maintenance suit against him in California. Rudy claims Fay is a resident of New York and that she has herself admitted that status in a previous action filed here.

If Justice McGeehan rules Fay is a New Yorker and cannot sue in California, Rudy will immediately move for a divorce from Fay, his attorney, Hyman Bushel, promised.

Should the ruling hold that Fay is a citizen of California and entitled to bring action against her husband in that state, early trial of the separate maintenance action is anticipated.

BEHIND the SCENES in HOLLYWOOD

By HARRISON CARROLL
Copyright, 1934, King Features Syndicate, Inc.
HOLLYWOOD, Calif.

After days of arguments, Johnny Weissmuller has won at least a temporary victory in the matter of Lupe Velez' personal appearances. The peppery Mexican star has agreed to stay on in Hollywood to do the picture, "In Old Louisiana" for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

By the time this is finished, Johnny will be through with "Tarzan and His Mate," so the newlyweds may go on tour together. Or, even if they go separately, one won't be left pining in Beverly Hills with only the family dogs for company.

In the movies, Tarzan always gives a cry of victory when he disposes of an opponent. Not so off-screen. Knowing Lupe, Johnny simply says: "Well, she's staying here, isn't she?" And he won't be drawn out any further.

Credit Bill Rankin with a squelch elegant. They were panning a certain ex-Broadway actor the other day as the worst case of "going Hollywood" in the last five years.

"Yeah, I've noticed it," said Bill. "And I think it's a great improvement."

Bruce Cabot is nothing if not nervy.

When he and Adrienne Ames went to Honolulu on their honeymoon, Bruce was sea-sick most of the way over. Somehow the news got back to Hollywood and Bruce always suspected that his boss, Merian C. Cooper, who was on the same boat, had passed the joke along.

So, when Cooper returned to town, Bruce sent him $75 worth of fish C. O. D.

Randy Scott tells of Cary Grant's most embarrassing moment. When the tall actor was on the high seas rushing to join Virginia Cherrill in London, he used to bombard her with high voltage wireless messages.

The third day out he radioed Virginia: "Distracted and bored."

When the boat landed, he had plenty of explaining to do. An operator had garbled the message and instead of the usual affectionate radiogram, Virginia had received: "Attraction on board."

In Garbo carries seclusion to a new height. To her latest home on San Vicente Boulevard, The Swedish star has had workmen erect three feet of barbed wire on top of the garden walls. The auto entrance is locked and barred. Attendants seem to have exact information when the star is returning, for when her car draws near the gates fly open, let it pass and then clang shut again.

Since quitting the newspaper business, Arch had headed the publicity department at Paramount and more recently at Fox. His successor here will be Gabe York, who has been advertising manager for the company in the East.

QUICK GLIMPSES:

The most embarrassed man in Hollywood the other day was the dignified C. Aubrey Smith. He plays the Duke of Wellington in the George Arliss picture, but when they came to film the battle of Waterloo he mistakenly got astride Napoleon's horse. They were nearly through the scene when someone discovered the error.

Jeanette MacDonald will be fiancéeless in a week or 10 days when Bob Richie leaves for Europe to arrange her concert tour.

The M. G. M. publicity department has received a frantic request from Alice Brady not to send out any more stories about her dogs. In the past week, three people have showed up with lost mutts for her to adopt or find a home for.

Carol Lofner brings sweet music back to the Beverly Wilshire. Among first nighters in the Gold Room were Rudolph Friml and a pretty Chinese dancing partner; Patsy Parker was there with Pierce Garrett, but don't get excited. Bert Wheeler is away making personal appearances.

Adrienne Ames' little girl is studying art. She's been at it since she was 5 and has a definite talent. And Ida Lupino has finally gotten around to counting the rooms in the new house. It has 24.
